

Scribal: My Mother in the Voting Booth

Stabbing the hole by Nixon's name, with a stylus on a chain, like some scribe in Lagash piercing wet clay slabs for the palace records. The count for the priest king's chariots & Amorite slaves must be exact. All day her adding machine has purred, the shavings litter the floor. Stylus through Nixon, stylus through Agnew. Two hours she's waited in the wet November snow of Minnesota & her cold next week will worsen to pneumonia. Over the churning columns she'll cough & pass out & waken in County General, shrouded in an oxygen tent where she cannot smoke. The count must be exact—14 lyres with the heads of bearded bulls, 130 votives, 6 figurines of Marduk fashioned of hammered gold.

The water glass is trembling.
Beside her bed I hover, the clear walls of the tent breathe in & out.
Flicker of Cronkite, of Nixon on the wall in black & white. He has a secret plan to end the war.

She sleeps. The tent draws a breath & the joint I smoked in the parking lot turns the light a jack-o'-lantern orange. I tell myself in my teenage hubris that I will not work on Maggie's Farm like her. Ain't gonna work like her to blindly serve.

But how her white ectoplasmic face looms back at me this morning (breathe in, breathe out, the tent's rise & fall) in the waiting room of Richmond Pediatrics.
All night Luke's coughed, meaning the pneumonia's returned & the office radio oozes hate, talk show & its porcine fascist droning on. He has a secret plan to replace the Constitution with gelignite.

Over us all it washes, the fine volcanic dust, over the fevered toddlers of the suburbs

& their mothers in sensible shoes, over the Parentings & Mademoiselles

& the parking lot minivans, the toxic "W"s affixed to their bumpers.
Breathe in & serve breathe in & serve. A slab of plastic for the co-pay, the computer station hums.

Cylinder seal & tapestry, ninety geldings in the palace stables. Nebulizer spewing Pulmicort.
Pink amoxicillin, doctored to taste like bubblegum. seven double-headed battleaxes, burnished bronze now oxidized the color of pond scum. Blindly, blindly do we serve.
O Priest King, Dear Leader,

Jealous God. There hangs her scarlet car coat with its Nixon button, bogus leopard skin along the collar.
She unzips the tent, she recovers. Manhattans prohibited for fourteen days.
The adding machine reanimates, numbers coughing & the tapes scrolling out. She lives on, twenty more deluded years. In the parking lot,

Rx in hand, I strap sleeping Luke in his car seat—streetlights, the yellow & blood-red leaves, pasted to the window by the rain. Let me serve him. Let me live on twenty years. Let me stand above the burial pits, their goods interred & catalogued, the miles of dirt tamped down.

August, 1953

A nurse gathers up the afterbirth. My mother had been howling but now could sleep.

By this time I am gone—also gathered up & wheeled out. Above my jaundiced face the nurses hover.

Outside, a scab commands a city bus. The picketers battle cops & ten thousand Soviet conscripts in goggles kneel & cover their eyes. Mushroom cloud above the Gobi, & slithering toward Stalin's brain, the blood clot takes its time. Ethel Rosenberg has rocketed to the afterlife, her hair shooting flame. The afterbirth is sloshing in a pail, steadied by an orderly who curses when the elevator doors stay shut: I am soul & body & medical waste foaming to the sewers of St. Paul. I am not yet aware of gratitude or shame.

I do know the light is everywhere.

Screensaver: Pharaoh

We had eaten the placenta in a soup that someone based on a family recipe for menudo, though someone else—it was Bill, I think—joked that it tasted just like chicken. This Year's Model was brand new & the needle stuck on "Lipstick Vogue," Costello snarling not just another mouth, not just another mouth, until Joe set down the bong & flicked the tone arm forward from the scratch.

& anyway, by this time Amy was shouting from the bedroom that she'd finally gotten Star to sleep, that the music should be Mozart or something. I've forgotten the midwife's name, but she sat sprawled on a patio chair, the distant blink of Tucson down the mountainside. She held an iced Corona & told us she was too worn-out to drive the snaking foothill two-lanes home. Good dope, cheap champagne, a soup of afterbirth: everybody but the midwife garrulous & now Papageno was flapping birdman wings in his mating dance around fair Papagena. So the talk turned to duets—scholastic in the way that stoner conversations go.

Whose placenta was it we slurped down with cilantro & a dash of cumin, telling ourselves the taste was not half bad—Amy's or Star's? & what about Derek, who now had moved to Mykonos, leaving his storied seed behind: what portion of the recipe was owed to him? Now came the tricky part—where did the soul inhere? The midwife rimmed her longneck with a lemon slice & allowed that we'd ingested perfection, the body's all-in-one: liver, kidney, blood supply, its vascular estuaries spidering from delta to sea, tasting not just of flesh, but of the corpus entire, which we all agreed was pretty far-out. Lord how I yearn sometimes for those days of sudden bedazzling insight, however false & addled. My eyes went Blakean.

By the firelight I watched the quaking dance of souls, bi- & tri- & quadrifurcated & hovering among us in a pea-soup fog, lavish as dry ice a-swirl from a spliff. My soul, your soul, our soul.

The Oversoul broadcasting its hundred thousand watts of Motown to the radio speakers of the whole Southwest; Aretha Soul & Otis Soul

& Sam Cooke Soul. & Pnuma, weighing twenty grams of blazing light.
But then the tone arm reached the aria's end. The LP clicked off. The room became sleeping bags & pillows, Mexican blanket covering a ratty sofa. The parts we didn't eat we double-bagged

& carried to the dumpster, padlocked to confound the coyotes.
The midwife took the couch & slept. & by the firelight the whole clan slumbered, the cave wall throwing shadows. This was thirty years ago. Where the business of the world has taken us I cannot say. I reboot, the pixels gather themselves & pulse at me. I could Google Amy, Google Star, MapQuest

Speedway Boulevard & call up Derek's obit from the Sentinel.
But the screen instead coalesces to a tomb painting of Pharaoh. Lordly he walks, preceded by his vassals, who bear his emblems & trophies, hoisted atop tall staffs.

Among them is Pharaoh's placenta, preserved & flapping like an ensign.

Raised to the sky, the crimson portal hovers in the wind. From it the God-King fell headfirst into this world.

Ending with a Quotation from Walden

For three generations their farmlands

withered

& the Anasazi took to eating human flesh, their enemies

First, then at last their kinsmen.

A pattern

Of scored

& incised human bones is evidence,

If you know how to read the auguries of microscopes.

Forensic:

from the Latin forensis, the marketplace.

The forum

where debate was engaged, where tricks

Of rhetoric & gesture might enhance your case.

But so much is conjecture—

whose sad flesh

Was churned within this white-ware pot?

Stranger

Or kin?

The Hated One?

The Beloved One whose touch

You'd stir to in the dawn,

