Dear Death

Cool cloak. So goth. I dig how the pleats ripple like pond water when you move, and the hood shadows the absence of your face. Sweet scythe, too. The craftsmanship of the wooden handle, how smooth the slow curve. I had to look it up—it’s called the snath (rhymes with wrath), or snathe (rhymes with bathe). I prefer the latter, the long a. Snath sounds like an infectious disease I might’ve caught if my mother wasn’t there to steer me from the gutter, from large puddles marbled green, mosquitoes scribbling above. How many times do mosquitoes do your dirty work anyway? Versus fleas? Versus gunpowder? How bone-tired were you in Tōhoku? The previous year in Haiti? Have you ever felt the sepia wind of remorse? I have 77 more questions for you, give or take, you’re often in my thoughts. Yesterday, while grinding coffee beans. While cleaning the lint trap. Dicing cilantro. Buying ink cartridges. Clipping my beard. I could go on and on, you’re that legendary in my head. It works this way: I’m running the knife across the cutting board, the cilantro breaks into confetti, I remember my mother scattering the herb over a Chilean dish, then her voice on Monday, “numbness in my leg,” “congestive heart failure,” and it fails, my mind fast-forwards to when it fails, I can’t help it, you grip her IV’d hand, pull her over, and it is done, her silence begins blowing through in waves, icing the room—the thought seized me so completely, the knife hovered still above the wooden board.
Seriously though, cool cloak. Sick black fabric. I heard if you turn it inside out, the whole world’s embroidered on the lining.
Figures

The math. He calculated at his desk, in November’s chrome light slanting through his office window: taxes paid against the price of one Reaper drone divided by federal budget.

He found the numbers online, photos of the aircraft, its fuselage narrow and windowless, a bone sheared lengthwise. Then a video:

five in the crosshairs.

Infrared will make anything carrying heat black. He thought, five black seeds slipping along the dirt trail.
It made watching easier. One walked ahead or four lagged behind, one smaller than the rest, which he wished he hadn’t noticed. The explosion looked like a black bouquet falling away down the center of his monitor.

Black bouquet too, he thought.

If I tell myself it was just four cents, I miscalculated, it was three, if I tell myself my pennies went to another drone, I chipped in for flight, not flame.
The light beside him brightened and he gave his eyes to the window, the wind behind the window, the wind diving across the street, shaking up the neighbor's oak. The leaves. He could not stop witnessing their letting go.

As the History Teacher Lectures on World War I

One student hears “mustard gas” and wonders if the air smelled like French’s or Grey Poupon. One chews his pencil like a chicken bone. One executes a stickman in the margins. Under the blond awning of bangs, one writes in pink ink a love note to the quarterback. One is stoned. One sniffs Wite-Out until his desk ripples. One lifts the trapdoor of a scab and licks his wound like a postage stamp. One fidgets in his sleep as if rodents tread over his flesh. One folds and folds a sheet of paper until it flies. With spit wads, one gives pimples to the blackboard.

We must learn from history or be doomed to repeat it, the teacher says. One hears the clock biting its fingernails beside the flag.
